Read reviews, watch videos and learn more about DVD Ghost in our website. Apparently, the documentary called "And Then Came Google" will premiere on several networks. I suppose this is an attempt to resurrect the failing "Who Killed the Electric Car" documentary series that was cancelled in 2012. Electricity is a complex beast. Since you can store it in batteries and you get it with an outlet. I'm interested in knowing what the energy cost of charging up a battery in a car and storing the electric energy in a car. I have a Nissan Leaf but only charged it twice in all my years on the road. I don't have the figures. You need to keep in mind the amount of energy, it takes to charge up a car. Say a car takes ten kWh to charge up. How much energy does it take to charge up that battery 10 times? Or 100 times? You'll probably find that the battery requires at least 20 kWh in energy, but more likely 50 kWh or more. The cost to charge this battery up will be at least $0.50, but there's a real chance it's at least $0.50 and more likely $2, or more. Let's say the cost is $1.00 per kWh. Then, to use all the stored energy in the battery, you need to create about 50 kWh from an alternator that sells 50 kWh per hour. That's 50 kWh to create 50 kWh of energy. You lose energy in the form of heat when driving an electric vehicle. So, the more you drive, the less energy you'll get out of the batteries. There are two ways to fix this problem. The most cost effective way is to build more batteries that hold more energy. Then you don't lose energy by driving the car. The most economical way is to use a hybrid like the Toyota Prius. Either one works, it's just that we haven't rolled out the most economical solution yet. Solar doesn't work for electric cars because, like fossil fuels, solar requires daylight hours to work. When was the last time you saw a solar road? The batteries and alternators have to be big to work with an electric car. They'll cost a fortune. And, they will be long lasting, but they won't last forever. Have we been ignoring the biggest energy efficient technology ever invented, that we know of?
