Reviewing layers. When you create a new document in Photoshop, the first thing you see is a drop-down menu to choose the active layer. But layers are not created with a single click. You are given a great deal of control over the layers in a file. You have the ability to hide or remove layers, cut and paste, duplicate, move, rotate, resize, and create new layers. Preview the image while editing. With the advent of digital cameras, photo-editing software was not used as much to actually take photos, but as a way of looking at photos after they've been taken. You can view each image of your camera's digital slide show before you start editing, and you can then revert back to that view when you are done. Use Smart Objects. If you're familiar with lightroom, photoshop also has a feature called Smart Objects. Smart Objects combine a traditional layer with an additional layer that adjusts to the visible image when you apply a filter or adjust the opacity. Adjusted selection tools. The polygon tool is the standard selection tool in Photoshop. You can modify the selection, cut, paste, and expand it. Improved canvas viewing. A wide range of tools are available to paint directly on the canvas, such as circles, lines, and text, and you can even rotate and scale the image. Load, Save, and Export. The basics of saving an image, such as saving it as JPEG and applying the correct color profile, are included.

Long-term Survivors of Childhood Cancer. Information on long-term survivors of childhood cancer has become readily available following the publication of reports from the Surveillance, Epidemiology, and End Results Program (SEER) database from 1973 to 2008. The goal of this review is to focus attention on a subset of long-term survivors of childhood cancer, those who have survived from early or late relapse. It is hoped that information presented will add to our understanding of late effects of childhood cancer and improve supportive care for these patients. Identification of an antioxidant in human plasma that competes with uric acid for hydroxyl radical formation. Purines in the diet, as well as endogenous purines, are avidly oxidized by the ferrous ion Fenton reaction ($\lambda(\text{max}) = 330 \text{ nm}$) via a two-step process involving superoxide anion and the hydroxyl radical ($\cdot\text{OH}$). Endogenously produced uric acid is a key player in redox reactions. The failure to recognize a role for uric acid in Fenton reactions was documented at the protein level in a previous study. However, the recognition of an ability of uric acid to compete with hydroxyl radical formation was not considered in that study. The goal of the present investigation was to examine whether uric acid is involved in the Fenton reaction at the protein level. High-pressure liquid chromatography (HPLC) analysis of the peroxidase-catalyzed oxidation of uric acid to urate in human plasma showed the presence of uric acid, a minor peak observed by the UV detector at the same retention time as uric acid, and an antioxidant with a different retention time. The antioxidant was partially characterized in HPLC and mass spectrometry (MS) experiments. The antioxidant competed with uric acid for its hydroxyl radical-forming ability, allowing uric acid to be detected by the formation of a uric acid-hydroxyphenyl hydrazine adduct in the MS system. The antioxidant that competed with uric acid for the formation of $\cdot\text{OH}$ was not the phenolic antioxidant but a non-phenolic antioxidant, most likely a peptide or a protein. Anyone who cares about the problems of health care in the U.S. is in the process of seeing their hopes dashed to pieces, buried under the rubble of the Affordable Care Act, HHS secretary Kathleen Sebelius's health care website, and the all-too-real consequences of health care reform that are being

The present invention relates to streaming media, such as streaming audio and streaming video. In particular, the present invention relates to techniques for providing streaming media. It is becoming increasingly common for TV broadcasts or movies to be streamed to a user over the Internet. Streams are often provided by content providers which update a show or movie at short intervals. When the show or movie being streamed is popular, the rate at which it is being updated may exceed the rate at which it can be viewed by a user. For example, while a user may want to watch a show being streamed and their screen updated 100 times per minute, the content provider may not be able to update the show 100 times per minute due to network congestion, etc. in which case a user may have to wait through long gaps to fill in the missing frames. Streaming techniques are commonly used to provide Real Time Streaming Protocol (RTSP) streaming. Real-time streaming involves the delivery of media data to a remote client without requiring the server to have the complete content of the media in advance. The data for the media are transmitted as they are requested by the client. As the user requests media data, the server delivers the media data from the server to the client in the order that the client requests it. Real-time streaming generally takes place over a network using a streaming protocol, such as RTSP. RTSP is an O.G.C.H. (Open Grid Computing H.A.D.) text-based protocol for multimedia communications via a distributed Internet system that provides Internet user connectivity and application visibility and control of distributed resources in an integrated, comprehensive fashion. RTSP provides a protocol to describe the desired delivery of media (i.e., a description of the stream) and an overall protocol for communications between clients and servers. A central server organizes the delivery of the stream data from different sources. To do so, the central server must know where the stream's media is stored on the different sources. This is typically done by using Uniform Resource Locators (URLs), which are address strings that define the location of the data on a network. Streaming media is a sequence of media data, which is typically encoded
