Q: Reinitializing a class I have a problem with re-initializing a class. I have a class encapsulating some properties (profile and news, and a class for news: NSDictionary), and in some functions I have to change these properties and then append these changes to the dictionary. The thing is, the in the initialization of the class I have a function that creates the dictionary that stores all the info, and in the NSObject init function I have a line NSMutableDictionary *datas = [NSMutableDictionary dictionary]; I don't want to append the changes to this dictionary because I will lose my changes when the instance of the class is deleted. The same thing happens if I initialize the class using "new", because the line with the creation of the dictionary is in the initialization of the class and so is deleted when the object is deallocated. When the class is deallocated I can re-create the class with init again (instance = [self initWithProfile:prof andNews:news]), but this means that a big amount of functions on the class are redefined, and the problem appears here. Any help? Or maybe some sources explaining this? A: If you need to share the variables between the instances of your class, then you'll need to make them mutable (non-copyable), and you'll need to create copies instead of just creating new instances, otherwise you will be sharing the data. So, while there are thousands of apps out there that display images, you know what's even cooler? Apps that actually do a lot more than that, and for free! And since my last post was a bit of a dive into visual effects, let's dive in to some more cool things I've been using... 1. The Google Drive Mobile App If you're familiar with Google Drive, this app for your phone might already be old news. But if you're a Chromebook user, this might be something new to you. If you're used to using Google Drive on your computer, then you're probably well aware of how much cooler it
